

7% Tribe launch draws female headline-makers

Hosted at The Shed at Steyn City, the 7% movement, which takes its name from the scant 7% of executive positions which are held by females in South Africa, is being launched on 31 August.

Guests at the event will have the chance to participate in a debate around pressing issues affecting women in the workplace led by a panel of eminent South African businesswomen, entrepreneurs and pioneers and mediated by Azania Mosaka and Masechaba Ndlovu. The event also includes fantastic networking opportunities, entertainment by Donovan Goliath and concludes with a five-star gourmet dinner.

Foremost female leaders

Many of the country's foremost female leaders have committed to the movement, ensuring that women from every sphere – from politics to science and entertainment – are represented in the Tribe. They include the likes of Faith Khanyile, CEO of WDB Investment Holdings, and ground-breaking scientific researcher Professor Glenda Gray. Refilwe Ledwaba, founder South African Women in Aviation and Aerospace Industry, is also lending her voice, along with the director of the Teddy Bear Clinic, Shaheda Omar, and leading entrepreneur Shamila Ramjwan of Famram Solutions.

Other high-profile supporters include Futhi Mtoba, chairman of Deloitte Southern Africa, Bojana Segooa, a senior lecturer Unisa's Department of Financial Accounting, Nonku Hlongwa, CEO of Surya Power and director of Nandi's Women Investments, Thembi Chagonda, managing director of Global Business Solutions and a board member of the Association of Skills Development in South Africa, and Regina Gouden, provincial manager of Small Business at Nedbank.

Corporate South Africa has also demonstrated its enthusiasm for this worthy cause, with several of the country's leading businesses purchasing tickets so that female staff may benefit from attending the event. Among their number are First For Women, Envisionit Capital Solutions, Werksmans, Transnet, WSP and SAICA.

Issue of female advancement is being embraced

"We're delighted to see that the issue of female advancement has been embraced by individuals and companies alike," says Tammy Menton, group head of marketing and events at Steyn City. "It's time that South African women are given a platform and a network to support each other and, in so doing, help drive each other forward," agrees her Cheeky Media colleague Janez Vermeiren.

They point to UK stats which show that places with greater gender diversity are 12% more likely to outperform the industry average – and yet, even internationally, the issue remains unsolved, with gender and ethnic discrimination costing the UK £125.6bn.

The 7% Tribe is aiming to make this a reality by rolling out a variety of events every month, including speed dating-style mentorship workshops, an online networking facility and regular informative articles in publications, programmes and websites from media partners, including Independent Media and The Morning Show.
