In a video message to guests; Professor Thuli Madonsela said; "It is all our responsibility to understand a small inaction can have grave consequences for the country, continent and the world." She went on to say that; "These young women of the Miss Earth programme have the greatest commitment to create change."

It has been an intense few months for the finalists who have been hard at work, with a mission to change the perception and understanding of climate change, the impact of environmental degradation and the crucial waste, water and food security paradigm.

Through the #WasteStopsWithME Campaign, finalists have been on the ground in cities and communities including, Johannesburg, Tshwane, Tembisa, Hartebeespoort, Cape Town, Soweto, Edenvale, the Midlands in KZN and Zakariya Park, Midrand and Bosmont, to name but a few; communities were engaged, clean-ups were hosted and communities gathered to understand and engage the topic at a local level.

The primary objective being to create awareness and more importantly to educate on the issue of waste management and the catastrophic effects of a lack of waste-consciousness for our country and the globe - with a core focus on taking the issue of waste to the individual and connecting ordinary South African's to their own waste generation and footprint.

Candy Tothill, Tsogo Sun's GM of Corporate Affairs, congratulated the Miss Earth South Africa 2019 winners on the announcement of this title. "We extend our warmest congratulations to the newly announced ambassadors and winners, all of whom have demonstrated their commitment to promoting environmental consciousness and improving conditions in their communities.
