

Brands: taking centre stage at festivals

By  Andrew Gibson

19 Jul 2018

What does the word festival mean to you? And if you ask the person next to you it will mean something different. The Oxford English Dictionary defines festival as: a day or period of celebration, typically for religious celebration. Looking at some of the festivals I have been involved in, it really is a celebration.

© Ciprian Boiciuc via Unsplash.com

Thus, I find myself in a prime opportunity to review the successes of the past festivals and consider what brands can do to maximise their potential for their next festival or activation.

Embrace the full festival journey, from ticket purchase to aftermath

Too often brands focus on just a ticket giveaway competition on social media and physical activation at a festival and fail to consider other touchpoints along the festival journey.

For a consumer, a festival spans much more than just the days it runs; it involves the excitement and discussion once the lineup, entertainment or attractions are announced, it's sharing memories after the event and, of course, watching the after movie. Tomorrowland does this extremely well, its after movies have received millions of YouTube views. There is a massive opportunity for brands to tap in to and even hijack numerous festival touchpoints.

Crossing borders in Africa with events

Glenn van Eck 10 May 2018

Understand the micro trends and capitalise on them

Each festival is different and has its own micro trends that matter to its particular audience. By using social listening, brands can identify these trends and create activations that have a deeper resonance with consumers because they are more in tune with the conversations specific to that festival, its nuances and its quirks.

Become synonymous

It is tempting to create new experiences each year and appear at different festivals with different offerings. However, this misses an opportunity to build credibility. Brands that consistently play an important role at the same festival over several years give themselves authority in the eyes of festival goers and they weave themselves into the fabric of that festival. For example, Standard Bank has been involved with the National Arts Festival for many years and its awards are what the artists chase for recognition.

Become part of the conversation

There are trends that stretch across the festival landscape and conversations, and brands can make the most of these to create experiences that resonate with their target market. Through listening to social media you can discover trends that will make you part of the social media conversation and be relevant. These insights will also provide an understanding in terms of festival behaviour that could help dictate activations, ensuring brands create something meaningful that can help make smaller budgets go further.

Don't forget the experience

People don't just go for the big name artists, by far the biggest conversation happening at festivals is around the connections to experiences and the people they're sharing them with. An experience is what the event marketing team latches on to and hooks messages around. Headliners pique interest, but it's the experience that gets people coming year after year, gets people talking and creates the buzz.

From the moment someone buys a ticket, through the festival and beyond, everyone talks about the experience. While budget can be a stumbling block, brands that find a way to become part of the conversation will succeed in connecting with all festival goers.

ABOUT ANDREW GIBSON

Andrew Gibson is a seasoned event professional, and has worked with Magnetic Storm since 2005, also opening Magnetic Storm Cape Town in 2013...

■ Brands: taking centre stage at festivals - 19 Jul 2018

■ Creativity and innovation - 13 Apr 2017

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>