

China beer consumption hits the 50 billion litre mark for first time in 2011

BEIJING, CHINA: It's the largest beer market in the world and it seems that when it comes to its importance for manufacturers, there will be no half measures. Latest research from Mintel reveals that China's beer market grew by 29% in volume terms in the five years to 2011, to reach an all time high total volume of 50 billion litres for the first time in 2011.

Furthermore, the market also grew 63% in value terms over the same period to reach a total market value of ¥454bn in 2011, with average value per litre of beer sold rising by 27% since 2007 - indicating that the market has seen significant development towards consumers drinking more higher-value beer products. More significantly, there was a marked up-tick in growth in volume beer sales in 2011, rising year-on-year to 2011 by 12% compared to only 6% volume growth in 2010, pointing to renewed consumer interest in consumption of beer.

Matthew Crabbe, director of China Research at Mintel, said: "China is where the leading multinational brewing groups are hoping to make most growth these days, compared to relatively flat established markets elsewhere and the continued growth in sheer scale is a key factor in that interest. With continued rapid rises in average incomes and the general feel-good factor about China's continued economic growth, consumers are not only drinking more beer, but are also beginning to drink more expensive beers. Consumer confidence has also translated into more people going out to eat, and this caused catering sales to continue to see an increase in significance to overall beer sales compared with retail sales."

China ahead of nearest rivals

At a total volume of 50 billion litres of beer consumption, China is considerably ahead of its nearest rival, the US, at 24 billion litres. Brazil at 14 billion litres, Russia and Germany at 9 billion litres respectively make up the remaining top five markets for volume consumption worldwide.

Today, lager accounts for ¥410bn, draught for ¥42bn and other beers for ¥2bn. In contrast to growing sales in the beer market in China, Wine and spirit sales in China have experienced a drop. While wine experienced value growth of 52% year-on-year to 2010, this dropped to just 12% year-on-year to 2011. Similarly, Spirit sales in China showed growth of 24% year-one-year to 2010, but this dropped to 16% year-on-year to 2011. Conversely, while beer in China showed sales growth of just 7% year-on-year to 2010, this increased to 13% year-on-year to 2011.

"While the market is booming, brewers need to compete more cleverly than ever before in order to engage with key consumer groups in China who will be key purchasers in the coming years including the youth and women's markets, as well as connoisseur drinkers of premium beers. The recent drop in growth of wine and spirits sales could leave room open for high-end 'snob brews' to find new interest. Indeed, the fact that wine and spirit sales have dropped, despite having enjoyed really strong recent growth, makes it the perfect time for premium beers to press the right kind of new interest buttons of the ever-fickle Chinese brand- and image-conscious consumers," Crabbe continues.

Brand, taste

Interestingly, brand ranks equally with taste for Chinese consumers when it comes to beer - and a quarter (25%) report these factors being the most important when choosing beer - much ahead of price which is the most important factor for just 8% of consumers. Conversely, advertising appears to have little impact as just 1% of Chinese consumers claim this factor to be the most important. Draught beer tops this list of type of beer drunk for Chinese consumer - with 72% of beer drinkers drinking this type. Pasteurized beer (53%), fresh beer (37%), iced beer (30%) and Weissbier (28%) also top the table in terms of preference. Fruit beer and Stout are also popular with around one in five consumers in China - with 23% and 21% choosing these types respectively, as are Low alcohol and alcohol free beers with 14% of consumers each.

When it comes to the top reasons for drinking beer, some 73% of Chinese consumers claim that this is when socialising with friends or family. The remaining top five reasons are: when eating at banquets or parties (62%), when entertaining guests at home (61%), accompanying a meal (44%) and when socialising with people after work (43%). Around a third (33%) of Chinese consumers claim to drink beer to wind down after work - and nearly one in 10 (9%) claim to drink it after playing sports.

More innovation still needed

However, in terms of Global New Product Development (NPD), USA accounted for 22% of new product launches in the beer category globally in 2011, followed by Finland with 7%, UK with 6%, China at 5% and France at 4%. In order to continue such strong volume and value growth, Mintel finds the need for focus on product innovation remains key for those wishing to capitalise.

"Increasingly competed between the leading beer groups, China's beer market still needs to see more innovation in products, packaging, regional and national branding and engagement with consumers, in order to maintain per capita growth, and encourage sales of more premium beers. Although beer companies have recently been more actively pursuing the youth market, few have really engaged with women consumers as a group in their own right, and who represent a key growth consumer group. Older and wealthier consumers are becoming increasingly "connoisseurs" of premium beers, but mostly for imported brands, and there is potential to "premiumise" local brands, especially regional favourites," Crabbe concludes.
