Mobility to rule video in 2018

By Priscilla Kennedy

Video is set to take over the digital landscape in 2018 with an estimated 74% of internet traffic taken by video. Even though mobile video will dominate, companies are not considering it seriously enough when it comes to content planning and video production.

A fully-fledged marketing strategy is needed and must include content if it is to be successful. How video is consumed is also crucial and as mobility starts to truly dominate, companies need to realise that it is fast-becoming the device of choice when accessing video.

Content calendar and ad rollouts

People are watching more content on-the-go, so it needs to be easier to consume and correctly configured. It's important to plan a content calendar and ad rollouts. There are also technical aspects to consider such as formatting for vertical phone screens; simplifying the message; making videos shorter and able to be played in silence. It basically requires smart use of typography and visuals.

If the video is monetised, a call-to-action or method of retargeting viewers is critical. Those who watched a certain percentage are targets and you don't want to lose the opportunity to convert them while they are using their device. There are other options such as working in silent or near-silent conditions, being easy to follow, getting-to-the-point and engaging designs.

Understanding video in the mobile space

Facebook's creative guideline changes were proof of the importance of mobile design. By recommending a 1:1 video format, completion rates of cropped clips increased by 67%. In addition, Buffer, reported that square-shaped videos take up 78% more space in a Facebook News Feed, giving content a better chance to get noticed.

Understanding video in the mobile space is vital. Netflix and Amazon kick-started the popular trend, underpinning the importance of featuring video in a content strategy. Facebook also responded with Facebook Watch, addressing the popularity of social viewing.

Building a community is important to brands, so to ignore the impact of video on a mobile device is too risky. From inception, videos bring advantages to SEO rankings and if you consider that research states that a human's attention span is shorter than a goldfish, it is clear impactful mobile videos have a great future.
