

SABC Education African EduWeek gets diamond sponsor

The SABC Education African EduWeek has a diamond sponsor - Intel - for the second year in succession. The show, scheduled for 1 and 2 July 2015 at the Gallagher Convention Centre, will offer more free-to-attend educational training and development for teachers and provide a futuristic look at teaching from more suppliers with the latest classroom technology and services.

"Intel is committed to empowering the youth of South Africa through education and technology to unlock economic opportunity. It is imperative that the private and public sector work together in order to ensure that the youth of this country have a bright future filled with opportunity," says Andre Christian, Business Development Manager for Intel South Africa.

Workshops

Intel will be presenting two workshops at the event.

"One will focus on inclusive education, which to a large extent we see as a forgotten component in South African education. Last year, we introduced it and we saw a lot of interest, but this year we want to take the next step by showcasing implementation strategies around inclusive education. We have gathered experts in this field to be part of this workshop, people that have worldwide experience in implementation strategies in inclusive education that will provide the impetus required in Africa to move it forward."

The second workshop is on the organisation's teaching programmes and what they have to offer. "The larger ecosystem may not be aware of what we can offer. These programmes are free and all you need to do is sign a licence agreement to be able to offer these programmes. They are accredited programmes and they are world class. We are bringing experts in these fields, US-based Intel employees, and I think it will be an eye opener for the people that do attend."

For more information, go to www.educationweek.co.za.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>