

Culture, tech, social; shifts and new growth intersections in Africa

For global business leaders, the continent we call home is simply the next frontier, a high potential market - a concept they are yet to figure out. This needs both a drastic rethink and immediate action: Africa is no longer just for the future, the continent is the new growth frontier. Starting today, in the next 20 years, business leaders will want to have invested in Africa.

Serah Katusia, managing director, GroupM East and Central Africa and SSA coordination lead, is optimistic about Africa because it is diverse, young, and growing and urbanising faster than any other continent across the world.

More than 50% of Africans are under the age of 20 - more babies born in Nigeria in a year than in the whole of Western Europe. Every diaper, milk and baby brand should be set up in Africa, connecting with millions of Africans in a deep and meaningful way.

There's also depth in the way its people interact with data and consume brands, content and media, with Africa's media landscape quickly growing, changing and evolving across the continent. We've seen a rise in digital and growth in TV consumption, with content creation at an all-time high.

This is fueled by better and more affordable internet connections, resulting in the democratisation of content production. It's no surprise as young Africans are creators - creators of content, creators of businesses, creators of movement... #WeCreate!

Gen Z: The generation that is crafting a better Africa

Ndeye Diagne, Kantar 5 Nov 2020

Young Africans want brands to connect with them beyond being customers, to stretch into uncharted territories and provide products and services that resonate with them in more meaningful ways. Your business needs to rethink its communications about products and services and get to know the human being behind the consumer persona.

There are immense opportunities in this new audience in Africa, with their love of all things digital and yearning for the new and the different. Brands will continue to need tailored, data-driven approaches to connect more meaningfully with the most connected generation of our times.

Insights and growth levers for brand connection

These three insights and growth levers can help your brands connect more intimately with the African audience and win sustainably:

1. There's a deeper love for culture and local flavours and textures, feeling globally connected and locally anchored. A growing sense of purpose and 'the right thing to do' increasingly turn consumers into citizen-first human beings.
2. Why shop anywhere else when I can buy directly from apps I use constantly? This is the incredibly exciting opportunity that most prominent social media apps offer to consumers. Everywhere around the continent, WhatsApp and Facebook have established stores in as much as they are communication platforms.

The new entrant is TikTok, and the cards are set to change when we think of the incredible growth the platform has had in Africa in just two years. In Senegal for example, TikTok usage went from almost 0 to 53%; in South Africa, it's 26% of internet users use the platform, 41% are under 24. As the platform wins share from established social media giants, it will counter the trend with new offers and lots more to see in this space - including commerce, of course!

3. We can't ignore the power of technology. Whether it's tech for fun, tech for good, tech for money - the continent's love for technology and all things digital is what's really transforming lives, lifestyles and brand choices.

Revealed: The top-ranking media channels and brands in 2021
