It also said it had spent around R32m, on diesel generators, which Premier Group CEO Kobus Gertenbac told Reuters was on top of many years of investment.

"Our general ability in terms of being able to run generators to operate bakeries is actually not cost prohibitive in relation to the category, so the amount of cost that it adds is a couple of cents a loaf and you can pretty much quite easily recover it in the market," he added.

He said, however, around 10% of total flour milling production was lost during the period because of the power cuts.

Competitor Tiger Brands, the touchstone of the fast-moving consumer goods industry, said last week in its six months interim results that power cuts cost it R37m in the grains sector alone.

South African businesses and households are being left without power for up to 10 hours daily. "In my view level eight would start to impact our ability to continue to produce enough product to service our market," Gertenbach added.

Eskom so far has not gone beyond Stage 6 power cuts, which require 6,000 megawatts to be shed from the national grid, but has said it may have to move to Stage 8, which would require up to 8,000 megawatts to be shed, translating to 16 hours of outages in a 32-hour cycle.

Since listing in March, Premier Group has lost over 12% of its value. It last traded at 5,251 cents per share down over 4.5% to the day.
