

Yes, I have heard about the Morgans!

Who hasn't seen the couple whose relationship or marriage is 'on the rocks' and then by some miracle a life-changing or endangering situation is expected to bind them back together. I don't mean to sound jaded but the question rather to be asked is 'Who hasn't heard about the Morgans?'

Everything you can expect from a romantic comedy if 'typical' doesn't already give you a good idea but there's definitely worse out there. I'm making this out to be a terrible movie when actually, it's not. Just don't expect anything more than your average entertainment and you can walk away with some fuzz in your heart mean I enjoyed it, but it's nothing new.

The Morgans, Meryl (Sarah Jessica Parker) and Paul (Hugh Grant) are in the middle of a trial separation when they witness a murder that changes everything. The Manhattan couple need to go under a witness protection programme and leave New York for a secret location in Wyoming while a professional hit-man is on the loose. They are cut off from the city with no means of contact; all they have is each other in a small town where they have a chance to salvage their relationship and face the real problem that is, their dissolving marriage.

There's always an element of anticipation that you just can't avoid when it comes to these kinds of movies but hey, if the shoe fits, watch it!
