

Why customer loyalty is becoming a thing of the past and what to do about it

 By Leigh Andrews

3 Aug 2018

Ask Afrika MD Sarina de Beer explained at the final day of the seventh annual CEM Africa Summit why data is the current trending commodity of 2018 and what it'll take to really resonate with today's fickle social consumer. It was quite the eye-opener. Here's what you missed.

The second day of CEM Africa 2018 focused on extracting value from data and outside-in CX. MC Leeanda Reddy introduced De Beer as someone who "walks the tightrope in red-soled stilettos." Add to the mix the fact that she holds two psychology-based master's degrees and tells it like it is, and we have a clear winner for my presentation of the day.

De Beer seemed to sense this, as she went on to present the knock-out keynote session of the day, on the need for smart data for smarter experiences, and measuring what matters when the needs and expectations of today's consumer have evolved drastically over time.

De Beer began by stating that in the increasingly competitive and fast-moving environment of today, customers' needs are changing faster than most corporates can keep up with.

#BizTrends2018: The ever-changing consumer

Dave Nemeth 8 Jan 2018

As a result, we tend to focus on getting those internals right, but De Beer says before you dive in and tinker with your products, to first take a step back and remember that it's increasingly about the people rather than the processes, as technology is just the enabler.

Social profiling and changing customer expectations

De Beer added that companies often ask for comments on aspects of a business that don't usually occur to or impact on the consumer, which results in an artificial form of engagement and unrealistic ratings.

“ We then over-interpret the numbers and come to questionable conclusions. If we are truly committed to customer experience, we need to rather focus on what does and doesn't work for them when they deal with our businesses, as scary as that may be. ”

Offering a snapshot of how customer expectations have changed over the years, De Beer confirms that companies are doing better in terms of accessibility and ease of engagement, but that's largely due to massive technological investment making things easier for the customer.

Very few brands are succeeding at making a true emotional connection and building that relationship with the customer. Here's why...

Research shows that what's important to consumers of today, from the businesses they work with, is the stability of employees, which is a fairly abstract concept; as well as that 'millennial mindset' motivator of total time taken to resolve queries and requests.

We want it fixed almost before we've noticed there's a problem.

So, De Beer pointed out that overall satisfaction definitely does improve over time due to those all-important technological advanced, but that equally important aspect of emotional satisfaction is usually just not there.

AI won't take our jobs - not connecting with consumers will

From an intra-personal point of view, De Beer touched on the collective unconscious worry about the implications of AI and robots taking our jobs, but that's likely not going to happen as our responsibilities become exceedingly more complex.

Instead, we should worry about our ability to engage with our customers, but many merely turn a blind eye.

#BODCT: Don't let robots take your job, boost your creative thinking!

Leigh Andrews 13 Oct 2017

My generation failed to create loyalty

Erik Du Plessis 22 Nov 2017

Unfortunately it seems that customers' loyalty to a specific brand no matter what is a thing of the past. Very few of us trust corporate institutions, challenger brands are taking over and we are slowly but surely becoming more polygamous in our banking.

Fake news is actually everywhere and sometimes we literally don't know what to believe.

As a result of these factors, brand loyalty is decreasing significantly, because by and large, we are comfortable with change as consumers. But what does this mean for the brands we work on?

De Beer received a round of applause for saying it's no longer good enough to just 'like' something on social media, you need to 'love' it to show it really resonates with you.

But then how do you differentiate between the things you really do love and those we use daily but don't necessarily have a connection with?

#BizTrends2018: Game-changing insights and trends

Ask Afrika 5 Feb 2018

De Beer added that customers are becoming ever more adept at using emotional language - just think of the wide variety of emojis and emoticons already out there, with updates added every few months to reflect the 'real world'.

In fact, we're 'comfortably numb' behind all those emoticons.

Ask Afrika's Orange Index Awards: Taking away our emotions

Danette Breitenbach 27 Oct 2017

Choice is, of course, a good thing, but De Beer's concern is that consumers are becoming increasingly fickle.

“ In addition, what we think about something isn't necessarily how we feel about it. That's a problem when it comes to consumer feedback surveys. ”

De Beer also pointed out that a commercial relationship is not built on a birthday SMS alone. Corporates have access to so much of our personal data yet most don't use it in a clever way that the consumer appreciates. Sad, but true.

How data can be used to connect brands with their audience

Laurretta Ndlovu, Dentsu 31 Jul 2018

Added to this, De Beer says as much as social media gives us a voice, the downside is that consumer expectations have changed, as we are always both on a screen and present - so we're usually not fully present in the moment.

De Beer feels that need to connect won't go away, but she says we are starting to disconnect, and also to unlearn the ability to build relationships.

That's worrying, as true emotional intelligence or EQ comes from practice and experience.

De Beer concluded that we will need to have difficult conversations with this customer of the future, who has expectations that most of our brands can't realistically meet - not just yet, anyway.

De Beer ended with the thought that we need to rethink our reliance on Maslow's hierarchy of needs and work harder at understanding how consumers are changing.

	Maslow	Digital Society	The Future
Self-fulfilment	Transcend and self-actualise	Do charitable projects	Self-Respect
Psychological Needs	Aesthetic awareness, knowing and understanding the world	No strings attached, instant gratification	Craving for experience
Psychosocial needs	Safety, Belonging, Love	WiFi- Social Media, Can't read emotions, Popcorn Brains- Digital Addictions, Narcissism, Post-truth/ Fake News	Robotic Engagements and Loneliness
Basic Physiological Needs	Genetic engineering and mass production of the food chain	Polarised food sources create massive food intolerances and large-scale neurological malfunctions- dumbing down of society	Food is entertainment, nutrition is pharmaceutical.

Time for lots of rethinking ahead. You can read up on more on #CEMAfrica, and watch for our coverage of the two-day conference.

Read more

#CEMAfrica2018: "Customer experience is the next competitive battlefield"

Leigh Andrews 31 Jul 2018

#CEMAfrica2017: CX predictions for the future, action to take TODAY

Leigh Andrews 16 Aug 2017

#CEMAfrica2018: Learn from these examples of storytelling to create emotional relevance!

Leigh Andrews 2 Aug 2018

#CEMAfrica2018: Why we need to talk about emotion in the boardroom

Leigh Andrews 1 Aug 2018

ABOUT LEIGH ANDREWS

Leigh Andrews AKA the #MilkshakeQueen, is former Editor-in-Chief: Marketing & Media at Bizcommunity.com, with a passion for issues of diversity, inclusion and equality, and of course, gourmet food and drinks! She can be reached on Twitter at @Leigh_Andrews.

- #Loeries2020: Behavioural economics as creativity, but not as we know it... - 24 Nov 2020
- #DI2020: Ignite your inner activist - representation through illustration - 27 Feb 2020
- #DI2020: How Sho Madjozi brought traditional Tsonga xibelani into 2020 - 27 Feb 2020
- #DI2020: Silver jubilee shines with Department of Audacious Projects launch - 26 Feb 2020
- #BehindtheSelfie with... Qingqile 'WingWing' Mdlulwa, COO at The Whole Idea - 26 Feb 2020

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>