Designer of environments

Specialising in public, cultural and hi-density mixed-use buildings, Wong earned his Masters of Architecture from Columbia University (2006) and his Bachelor's from UC Berkeley (2001). In an interview with Ssense, Wong explained that while he was at Berkeley, the school he was at was called the College of Environmental Design and that he only recently started thinking about architecture in that way, as an 'environment'.

"You're designing environments, but not necessarily in an ecological sense. Everything around you, whether it's the four walls you're in, the air temperature, how many plants you put in your place – all those things are an atmosphere you're creating. You're designing a component of a much larger environment, which made us realise that we have a bigger responsibility. The environment you grow up in or live in affects how you view the world, what your priorities are, how often you see your friends, how healthy you are or aren't."

After doing internships at OMA in New York and EHDD in San Francisco, he worked as a design architect at Rex Architecture in New York for two years and then decided to freelance for another two years before he founded Family, architectural practice that describes itself as a 'designer of environments', together with Oana Stanescu.

Kanye West's volcano

One of Family's fans was the musician, designer, and entrepreneur Kanye West. They collaborated when Stanescu designed the 50-foot-tall volcano (and an accompanying moon-like disc) that appeared on stage for West's 2013-14 Yeez tour. "Well, of the people we work with, the best are the ones with a strong sense of their gut," says Wong in an interview with Curbed. "Kanye is that person," Wong laughs. "He'll look at things and say: 'That's it!'"

Despite this solid run, Stanescu and Wong have recently decided to go their separate ways and disband the practice. While Stanescu pursues a multifaceted practice under her own name, Wong has also decided to start his own firm, Fo with projects already in the works in New York, San Diego and Hong Kong. Wong is also the co-founder of Friends of Pool, the world's first water-filtering floating pool for New York City and one of the largest crowdfunded civic projects in the world.
