

Africa's youth bulge is an opportunity to transform the continent

By Jean Pierre Elong Mbassi

14 Aug 2017

RABAT, Morocco - The persistence of conflicts and wars on the continent continues to fuel uncertainty for the resolve of African leaders to strive and propose a better life for the youth and future generations.

Street Children is a Global Issue that cannot be ignored

- Urbanisation is contributing to the growing number of homeless children in Cities across the continent
- Children are leaving their rural homes in search of work in our towns and cities
- There are over 150 million Street Children worldwide with Africa having one of the largest numbers

UCLG Africa network of female Mayors and local elected of Africa (REFELA) will launch this year a campaign on "African Cities Without Street Children", to address this emerging phenomenon before it goes out of control. Please contact UCLG Africa to get involved in our campaigns

 UCLG AFRICA
United Cities and Local Governments of Africa
Cité et Gouvernements Locaux Unis d'Afrique
CGLU AFRIQUE

This year 2017, the theme of the African Union Decentralization Day celebrated on 10 August, is Youth Participation. At the Local Government and UCLG Africa levels, we translate this as "investing in youth". It seems we are stating the obvious.

According to the US Census Bureau in 2010, 63% of the Africa's overall population was below the age of 25. The average age of the African population is 19. We are talking of over 300 million people that will become 500 million in less than 20 years from now.

A threat or an opportunity?

A threat if one considers that Africa has the worst schooling outcomes in the world with 51% out of school in the age group of six to 14 years. This translates into the emergence of the phenomenon of "street children" in African cities where more and more children and young people are homeless and live and sleep in the streets.

In Sub-Saharan Africa according to ILO, three in five of the unemployed are youth; and 72% of the youth population live with less than $2 a day. In addition, 10 to 12 million young people join the labour market each year, adding year in year out to the African working poor.

The African Union has declared 2009-2018 “the African Youth Decade”, but the young people in Africa do not have any real taste of the implementation of this political declaration. The persistence of conflicts and wars on the continent continues to fuel uncertainty for the resolve of African leaders to strive and propose a better life for the youth and future generations, not to mention all the adverse decisions around youth due to poor governance on the continent.

For sure there is no quick fix for the youth situation and the unemployment boom, but the reality is that more and more young people in Africa are losing hope of having any future on the continent. Hence, their despair and struggle to find a better life out of the continent, taking incredible risks to try and cross the Mediterranean sea at the expense of their own lives.

Is the situation definitively desperate? Of course not. Even if there remain a lot of concerns.

The first piece of good news is that Africa represents over 30% of the world's youth population. Africa is the youngest continent in the world: 21% of the 1.2 billion people on the continent are between 15 and 24 years old, whereas 42 % are less than 15 years old.

The good news

In the next 20 years, Africa has the opportunity to benefit from a “demographic dividend” where there will be a large workforce supporting fewer children and the elderly, lowering the dependency burden and freeing up resources for development and the improvement of productivity. There are good reasons to hope that educational efforts can yield results in terms of a better quality and skilled workforce.

In that sense, the youth should be considered as the key and unique player for the economic and social structural transformation of Africa. They are the energy and creativity of the future. That is where Africa's renewal and renaissance will come from.

The second piece of good news is the determination of young people on the continent to take control of their own lives, creating their own jobs in the popular economy, investing in the tech- economy by adapting new technology's to fit the reality and economic context of Africa.

But this good news still remains fragile. To transform this emerging potential into capabilities with effective scale-up and implementation on the ground, there needs to be a drastic transformation in the way African societies consider youth participation? It takes affirmative action to create an enabling and conducive environment for youth participation in society; and local governments should be at the forefront of this endeavour.

© Sura Nualpradid via 123RF

One of the remarkable initiatives in that regard is the proposal from the UCLG Africa network of female Mayors and local elected women of Africa (REFELA) to launch a campaign this year on African cities without street children, to address this emerging phenomenon before it goes out of control. All African local governments are invited to take part in this initiative.

Local governments should also be proactive in opening up new opportunities for youth by:

- Organising open-door operations for youth in order to acquaint them with the functioning of local councils and administrations.
- Encouraging the creation of municipal councils for the youth that supports and prepares young people to understand more about the dispensation of city management responsibilities.
- Opening a youth desk at the local government premises to collect ideas from young people on the way to address burning issues that impede the improvement of the living conditions of the population or that can boost efficiency in service delivery.
- Launching a youth empowerment program addressing the main concerns of young people, including job creation; support for entrepreneurship; education, culture, arts and heritage; sports and leisure; etc.

But for local governments to be in a proactive position, they themselves need to be empowered by their national governments. It is striking that despite the strong political will expressed by the heads of state and government of the African Union, that adopted the African Charter on Values and Principles of Decentralization, Local Governance and Local Development at their Conference in June 2014 in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea - where only 11 AU members signed it and only two have ratified it.

Not to mention the situation where local elections are not organised regularly or in a timely way that allows people to democratically choose their local leaders; and even worse, where elected officials are being replaced by appointed ones to manage local governments.

This is a clear demonstration that celebrating a Decentralization Day has no meaning, if the African Union members cannot honour even commitments made by their Heads of State and Government. Always remember this Egyptian wisdom: “The heart of the matter is not about speculating around the action, but to act”.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Jean Pierre Bong Mbassi is secretary general, UCLG Africa.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>