How do we manage risk in Africa?

Whilst sub-Saharan Africa's economic growth outlook remains relatively robust, the story of 2015 so far in the region has been about declining commodity prices, rising political risk in Central Africa and ongoing concerns over security in East and West Africa. Dominant regional economies that include Nigeria and Kenya continue to face the threat of terrorism. Undoubtedly the risk of terrorism, political and economic sustainability is a threat to business activity in many countries on the continent. Despite these rising challenges, Africa presents attractive commercial opportunities. Drawn by the continent's promising prospects for strong economic growth and its abundant resources and growing consumer markets, multinational companies are entering and expanding their business footprints in Africa. The relatively high financial returns in Africa are a reflection of the perceived high risk of doing business on the continent.

Key themes to be addressed:

- Neutralising the Threat of Fraud and Corruption in Africa
- As Africa Rises, are its Politics Regressing?
- Terrorism and its Impact on Africa's Outlook
- Rising Risk in a Low Commodity Price Environment
- The Rising Risk Temperature of Currency and Stock Market Risk - Economists Insight
- How Do We Manage Environmental Risk in Africa - Food Security, Climate Change, Natural Disasters and Water Security
